

Leading Society

by Engr. Abi Sofian bin Abdul Hamid

Dear Readers,

The subject of a leader or leadership has always been fascinating among the members of a group. Rightly or wrongly, this could be due to perceptions that a leader enjoys having powers to make decisions. Most people would see being a leader as having many privileges instead of carrying a heavy burden in the form of responsibility and accountability. The question is, do members of an organisation know what kind of leader is right for their organisation? If not then how would they ensure that their organisation will become a successful one and remains so?

An organisation such as The Institution of Engineers, Malaysia (IEM) is no exception. Being a professional body and a learned society, the challenge is surely to ensure that the right leader helms IEM. The leader must be able to take the organisation to a higher level in terms of achievement. It is by no means an easy task. The leader needs to have certain criteria to be effective. Outlining the vision and mission of the organization is only the beginning. These statements of intent need to be sold to the stakeholders to get their buy in and support. The understanding needs to be aligned at all levels. Spelling out action plans will make the path to the goals with better clarity.

The progress of all the actions is to be monitored with critical milestones. In today's challenging environment the values of integrity, inclusiveness, innovation, among others should not be underestimated. A leader should be a good motivator and inspiration to the other members of the group.

On another level, IEM as an organisation can also become the leader among learned societies at least in this country. Towards that end, all members will have to raise the relevant standards in their practices. With good leadership enhancing the value of the members and organisation itself, surely the objective of being the best is not out of reach. With this in mind, JURUTERA would like to take this opportunity to wish every and greater success to the incoming leadership team of IEM. ■

"Together we build this nation and ensure sustainable success"

Warm Regards,

The Editor
